Computing for older users: Patronising or practical?

Rory Cellan-Jones | 08:55 UK time, Wednesday, 11 November 2009

What connects Italian vegans, Valerie Singleton, and Linux Mint? Well they're all involved in a firm whose business is bringing computing to older users.

Whether or not Simplicity Computing succeeds will be a big test of two things - the appetite of older people to get online and the attractiveness of open source software as a means of dealing with digital exclusion.

Yesterday we took 80-year-old Betty Parsons for her first encounter with a computer. She climbed the stairs at the home of Nigel Houghton, who's masterminding the Simplicity venture, and sat herself down in front of the machine. When it's switched on for the first time, up pops Valerie Singleton - co-founder of the business launching Simplicity - and starts explaining what to do next, much like Microsoft's talking paperclip.

It's very basic - how to use a mouse, how to navigate your way around the simple front

Our nation is constantly moving forward technologically. Most would agree that the youth of today are more tech-savvy than many adults. Everything we do now-a-days seems to involve a computer element in one way or another. Unfortunately, the elderly are being left behind. A 2004 report from the Pew Internet & American Life Project reported that approximately 22% of American adults age 65 and older have access to the Internet.

Linux PC launches for the elderly

A PC to encourage seniors to use computers and explore the Internet has been unveiled by former Blue Peter presenter Valerie Singleton and in name Linux. The SimpleITy system is designed for elderly people who are not used to using PCs such as myself, and it's set up with a Linux Mint based operating system and an Eddy.org Linux email client.

Valerie Singleton wants more Facebook friends, promotes Linux for the elderly

By Vladislav Savov posted Nov 11th 2009 6:40AM

We're not really sure whether to consider this patronizing or genuinely useful. Former Blue Peter presenter Valerie Singleton, who is herself an advanced age now, has partnered with Wessex Computers to create a custom Linux desktop targeted at easing the elderly into the use of a computer. Dubbed SimpleITy (the Brits do love their puns), it features only six chunky buttons that lead to a web or file browser, chat, email and profile apps, and awesomely enough, video tutorials from Valerie herself. Once you get your web-legs under you and

В Великобритании появился в продаже десктоп SimpleITy, предназначенный для людей старше 60 лет, которые никогда не пользовались компьютером и Интернетом.

SimpleITy работает под управлением ОС Linux со специальной интерфейсной настройкой, которую при желании можно отключить. Система не требует авторизации, а в интерфейсе компьютера отсутствуют выдающиеся меню, чтобы не смущать слишком раз неподыкных пользователей.

На рабочем столе ПК предусмотрено всего шесть крупных пунктов меню для доступа к самым необходимым функциям (электронной почте, чату и др.). В память устройства загружено 17 видеороликов, рассказывающих о том, как пользоваться компьютером.

Приобрести SimpleITy, который создан при содействии компании Wessex Computers и сайта Eddy.org можно только по предварительным

Computer Developed for Silver Surfers

Simple computer, developed for the elderly and who has never used a PC, has been launched in Britain, the system uses a six inch screen and up to six large buttons to help users use functions such as email and web browsing. The computer was created from ideas from Valerie Singleton, the television presenter, along with the help of computer engineer and entrepreneur, David Houghton, who decided she idea, and a small help computer company called Eddy.org.
